

New City Administrator Starts Work this Week in Centerville

The Centerville City Council has hired their city engineer to be the new city administrator as well.

Mark Statz assumes those duties this week, following the departure of Michael Ericson in August. In the interim, former Centerville city administrator Dallas Larson handled the job.

Mark Statz

Statz has been Centerville's city engineer for ten years, while employed by Stantec (formerly Bonestroo), a company that provides engineering and other services to city governments.

Around 40 applications were received, and four finalists' names were made public. Besides Statz, they were: Teresa Bender, Centerville city clerk; Kevin Kress, city administrator of Clearwater; and Robin Leslie, whose last job was as administrator of Wells, Minnesota.

Mayor Jeff Paar announced at a televised city council meeting Aug. 23 that "the city of Centerville and Mike Ericson have separated employment" and that the council would have a closed meeting later that night "on matters related to the separation." Ericson's salary was $102,500 and had been on the job in Centerville since November 2014. Previously, he had been the city administrator in Landfall and Hugo. (See Record, April 11, April 25, Sept. 26 and Oct. 10, 2013).

The council discussed the salary range for the new hire and arrived at $90,000 to $110,000. Paar asked councilor Steve King for his opinion, responding with a shrug, "that's what they (city administrators) go for."

King made other observations during the Aug. 23 council meeting, recalling when they hired Ericson: "when we first went through it, I wanted to know what legal expertise he had so that he could follow meetings and stuff like this, and his personality second."

King had misgivings whether there would be a pool of applicants that would be representative of a middle ground between former city administrator Larson and Ericson: "Mike was more of a socialite and Dallas was more down to earth... is there enough people out there to get that mix?"

King also said to his fellow city councilors, "Dallas (Larson) was all business and everything, he's kind of cold, and Mike's (Ericson) kind of over here — party time or whatever... I can see both sides. I'm just trying to find that mix where you can still get your work done but not be so damn serious about it but not frivolous either."

Get ready to hear a lot more about the urban-rural divide from Minnesota politicians

By Briana Bierschbach - MinnPost

In the field of Republicans running to be Minnesota's next governor, one candidate's top issue is abolishing the Metropolitan Council, the regional planning agency for the Twin Cities. Another candidate promises to put a moratorium on funding for urban light rail projects, while yet another wants to defund so-called sanctuary cities like Minneapolis.

Going after Minnesota's urban core is not an unfamiliar pitch from Republicans, who swept into control of the Legislature in 2016 by dominating in rural areas throughout Greater Minnesota. During the 2017 session, GOP lawmakers spent no small amount of effort trying to pass a slew of proposals that aimed directly at the state's two largest cities, Minneapolis and St. Paul: everything from cutting back on their funding to blocking them from passing their own minimum wage and labor standards.

"Why am I running for governor?" Republican state Sen. Dave Osmeck, a candidate for governor, said at a recent forum. "Because we need a fighter in St. Paul for Minnesota values. Not Minneapolis values, not St. Paul values, but Minnesota values."

Such talk has also become increasingly common. As the wide-open 2018 race for the governor's office heats up, the rhetoric about an urban-rural divide has become a main talking point for Republican candidates as they seek to woo the hard-line activists who decide the party's endorsement, and it will also likely be a theme in any Republican general election campaign. When it comes to the 2018 campaign, in other words, the urban-rural divide is still alive and well.

Senator Benson named Legislator of the Year by Minnesota Cooperative Network

The Minnesota Cooperative Network, the Minnesota branch of the largest statewide co-op trade association in the country, has named Senator Michelle Benson (R-Ham Lake) as their Legislator of the Year for 2017. She won the honor for her advocacy of initiatives benefiting cooperatives around the state, including the establishment of a new law allowing cooperative network members to obtain much less expensive group health plans.

"I am humbled and honored to receive this award because of what it represents — successful passage of an important reform," said Sen. Benson. "Farmers often purchase their health care coverage on the individual market, and therefore have been particularly susceptible to the Obamacare premium spikes we've seen in recent years. Minnesota has more cooperatives per capita than any state in the country, and they have been fighting to make this important change for years. I'm thrilled we were able to get it done this year."

"Senator Benson has been a tireless advocate for cooperatives," said Patrick Murray, director of government affairs for the Cooperative Network. "Her strong leadership has given thousands of farmers and their families a new health care option previously not available to them. We are proud to call her an ally."

The Cooperative Network is one of the premier cooperative trade associations in the country, serving more than 400 member-cooperatives in both Minnesota and Wisconsin, and is owned by more than 6.1 million residents between the two states. Minnesota is one of the top co-op states in the country. Cooperatives annually record about $34 billion in revenue and employ approximately 46,000 people.

Mayor Paar described how he saw things. “Here’s what I’m looking for in the next administrator: We’re a small town and you’re going to have to roll your sleeves up and get in and help with the finances, help with the budget and the permits if need be. It’s a hands-on-everything job. We are small, and staff-wise, we are light, we are lean.”

City councilor Russ Koski said, “I think we ask our city administrator to do a lot because we have a small staff.”

The mayor said he wanted his points to be clearly made to applicants when the job was advertised: “There’s not a whole lot of delegating in the city. We have a very small Public Works department and we have two office staff people other than the administrator...” The council had also been deliberating the need to hire a part-time employee to help with the office load. — Bryan Olson for ACR

Trains, Met Council and sanctuary cities

It’s not surprising that Osmek would be talking about these kinds of regional issues on the campaign trail: The second-term senator from Mound has made them a centerpiece of his efforts in the Legislature.

Osmek championed a bill last session to abolish the Metropolitan Council, the 17-member board appointed by the governor that has regional housing and transportation planning authority that can supersede local governments. Osmek believes the council should be eliminated and the powers redistributed to local officials, who are elected and can be voted down by citizens.

He’s now talking about his plan at candidate forums across the state as he pivots to run for governor, and he’s said he’s been surprised at how many people are familiar with the issue. If they’re not, he’s found that eliminating the organization is an easy sell.

“They are definitely tuned into that issue, regardless of whether they are in Litchfield, Owatonna or Two Harbors,” he said. “They are looking at the rural issues, but also what affects the metropolitan area, because they are all connected in one way or another. For the ones who don’t understand it, once you explain it to them, they are appalled at what the Met Council has been doing and how they’ve been running roughshod over the counties.”

Osmek also led an effort last session to petition the federal government to block funding for the Southwest Light Rail Line, the controversial $1.86 billion transit project that has struggled to get lawmakers to fund the state’s portion of the cost. He said it’s an issue that resonates statewide.

“It’s just not the fact that they are trying to ram this light rail down our throats,” Osmek said. “People in Greater Minnesota know that one way or another they are paying for this boondoggle. They come into the metro and they see that their roads not being built. It impacts them directly.”

There are 11 total Republican candidates running for governor, including state Rep. Matt Dean, former county official Lance Johnson and a handful of activists. And Osmek is not the only candidate talking up urban-rural issues on the campaign trail. Jeff Johnson, a Hennepin County Commissioner who ran for governor in 2014, has also said he would scrap the Metropolitan Council and put a moratorium on funding for light rail projects while he’s governor, and has instead advocated for more funding for bus lines.

Meanwhile, another gubernatorial candidate, former Republican Party Chairman Keith Downey, said cities like Minneapolis, which limit their cooperation with the federal government on some immigration laws, shouldn’t get state funding. “Public safety is the first duty of government,” he said. “To promote law and order and protect our communities, including our immigrants, we will enforce the law, de-fund sanctuary cities and respect and support those who enforce the law.”

Long simmering political divide

The debate about and between urban and rural areas in Minnesota isn’t exactly a new phenomenon. The urban-rural divide has been around in some form or another for decades, often materializing as the ongoing fight over Local Government Aid (aka LGA) — the funds the state provides directly to cities to help them pay for things like police, firefighters and street repair. At the Legislature, there’s often a push to cut back or redirect aid that goes to cities like Minneapolis, St. Paul or Duluth in order to send it to smaller cities and towns across the state.

But the urban-rural dynamic — or at least the way politicians talk about it — has grown more acute over the years, partially due to the state’s changing demographics. As the state’s cities swell with younger, more diverse voters who tend to lean left, large swaths of rural Minnesota have come to be dominated by older voters who tend to vote Republican.

The effects have mostly played out in Minnesota’s last two elections, with Republicans picking up nearly a dozen House and six Senate seats from rural areas. They did so with a message that often attacked things like funding for light rail lines or other Twin Cities-specific projects, or hitting on the theme that certain parts of the state were being “left behind.”

The message worked particularly well for Republicans in Minnesota last fall. Though Democrat Hillary Clinton carried the state in the presidential election, it was a narrow victory, and the GOP picked up enough seats to take full control of the state Legislature. In the session that followed, Democratic legislators were regularly at odds with Republicans over provisions to pre-empt Minneapolis and St. Paul from passing their own minimum-wage and paid sick-leave laws. Republicans also proposed cutting Minneapolis and St. Paul’s LGA funding and Minneapolis’ pension programs. There was also a major debate over how much funding to grant metro-area bus lines and light rail projects.

Many of those proposals fizzled due to the actions of Republicans’ most powerful opponent: DFL Gov. Mark Dayton. He pushed for more funding for transit projects, and late in session, he promised to veto any bill that included a pre-emption proposal for Minneapolis and St. Paul. In the end, only one pre-emption proposal made it through: Blocking cities from passing ordinances to ban plastic bags in grocery stores.

Urban-rural economic disparities

Dayton’s lonely defense against Republicans’ targeting of cities has Democratic groups worried. At a time when state and federal politics are more paralyzed than ever, cities have largely taken the lead when it comes to promoting and implementing progressive policy goals like increasing the minimum wage or changing workplace labor rules.

But proposals to pre-empt cities from doing so have cropped up in states across the nation.

In Iowa, after several counties passed and changed ordinances to raise the minimum wage, legislators reversed those increases and froze the minimum wage at the federal level of $7.25 per hour. In 2015, the City of St. Louis passed an ordinance establishing a minimum wage that was higher than Missouri’s. Legislators reversed that increase during the 2017 session.

“This issue, which has been kind of a technical issues of local government powers in the past, it really is bubbling up now as a key fault line,” said Paul Sonn, general counsel for National Employment Law Project, which does research and supports progressive labor laws across the country. “It will be interesting to see how it plays in the 2018 election. One of the clearest places is likely Minnesota, because there was this high stakes battle last spring. Who wins the governor’s race will decide how things go in the future.”

There are six Democrats running for governor, including St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman, DFL Reps. Tina Liebling, Paul Thissen and Erin Murphy, U.S. Rep. Tim Walz and state auditor Rebecca Otto. Many have pushed back on the idea that there’s a deep divide between urban and rural voters; they aren’t necessarily talking about pre-emption and the Metropolitan Council on the campaign trail — and they’re not hearing much about it from voters either.

“It’s a very cynical attempt to divide us as Minnesotans for political advantage. It’s the worst of what politics are about,” said Coleman. “No one is bringing up the Met Council. That hasn’t come up in one conversation that I have had. What people are worried about is that there is economic vitality in cities across the state.”

Yet Thissen, who represents Minneapolis in the House, said some regional divides do exist, even if Democrats haven’t always been good at talking about them. “[In the campaign] we are having a very healthy discussion, one that gets beyond what has been a problem on the Democratic side, which is to paper over that these issues exist,” he said. “One thing we haven’t acknowledged enough is that where you live does shape how you live. There are huge economic disparities around the state.”

It was a major criticism of Democrats in the election last fall: They didn’t communicate clearly how they would improve the lives of families struggling to get by in rural parts of the state. Recognizing disparities in economic opportunity in between urban and rural areas — and having a good message to fix the problem — will be key for Democrats to talk about in the 2018 governor’s race, he said.

“It’s around economic opportunity,” Thissen said. “In every part of our state the economy is doing better, but remoteness comes with a cost, and we ought to be willing more to support people and institutions to live in remote areas.”

Always on the lookout for governmental waste, fraud, and abuse in Anoka County

November 24th, 2017

Quote of the Week: "In this spirit, Thanksgiving has become a day when Americans extend a helping hand to the less fortunate. Long before there was a government welfare program, this spirit of voluntary giving was ingrained in the American character. Americans have always understood that, truly, one must give in order to receive. This should be a day of giving as well as a day of thanks."

- President Ronald Reagan

Quote of the Week: "He comes up and he grabs me, puts his hand behind my head, and he aggressively comes in and mashes his mouth against mine and he sticks his tongue in my mouth. His mouth was wet and slimy. To this day I call him Fish Lips."

- Leeann Tweeden, victim of Sen. Al Franken

Quote of the Week: "I think American women should be lining up with their presidential kneepads on to show their gratitude for keeping the theocracy off our backs."

- Feminist Nina Burleigh on Bill Clinton

Al Franken's busy hands and slimy mouth have utterly exploded the Left's plan to turn 2018 into a "Year of the Woman" election and smear campaign against Republicans.

Unemployment is low, the stock market is up, home values are strong, and Republicans are in control.

The solution? Politicize an important and real issue like sexual harassment to redefine the election.

Never let a crisis go to waste, the Democrats tell us.

Then Al Franken showed up. So did Congressman John Conyers.

If nothing else, the Al Franken episode has so far reminded us that the Left practices a vicious and calculated moral relativism that values collective power far more than individual rights.

Apparently, "believe her" and "#metoo" applies only so long as the harasser isn't ingrained in the Progressive Power Structure.

What's happening to women victimized by Franken, and even one who hasn't, is following a vile yet predictable pattern.

This pattern follows two separate but mutually supporting narratives that pursue the strategic objective of keeping the harasser in power.

The first is to attack and minimize the victim.

Supporters of the victim obliquely and skillfully cast doubt on the victim's claims.

This week, multiple women who have worked with Franken came forward to proudly proclaim that Pervy Al didn't harass them.

How quaint. So there is some sort of acceptable harassment ratio? Refrain from harassing 10 women and you get a freebie with colleague number 11?

The purpose is to cast doubt on the veracity of the victim's story.

If scores of women are vouching for Al's gentlemanly habits, then perhaps this one woman isn't being honest.

Liberals have also leveled ad hominem attacks on Ms. Tweeden by noting her appearance years ago in Playboy, implying that she lacks the moral virtue to be believed.

It wasn't that long ago that feminists celebrated the right of liberated women to proudly present their bodies. Moreover, that presentation also represented her sovereignty over herself as a type to self-determination akin to the right to choose abortion.

But when that liberated position suddenly becomes a scarlet letter when she accuses a progressive power broker of sexual harassment.

Then there's plain old intimidation. The game plan is to simply savage anyone who expresses sympathy for the victim or has the temerity to suggest that the harasser be held accountable.

Such is the case with Abby Honold. Ms. Honold is a rape victim who has been pursuing federal legislation dealing with the subject.

She prevailed upon Al Franken to sponsor her bill.

When he became embroiled in scandal, Honold rightly looked for another sponsor, which brought down upon her a maelstrom of invective from Franken supporters, including one who declared that she should "really be raped."

That is one of the most sickening and disgusting statements we've ever read here at the Watchdog.

The statement not only called for her to be sexually assaulted, it minimized her experience as a survivor of assault. There's a special place in hell for the person who wrote that statement.

Franken and DFL Party Chairman Ken Martin should be called upon to condemn the statement right away. And so should Amy Klobuchar.

The second narrative is to minimize the offense and call for meaningless punishments that fall well short of calling on Franken to resign and give up an important liberal vote in the Senate.

Social media has been filled with liberal apologists arguing that the offenses were "only" unwanted groping and forced kissing. "It's not like he molested children" read one liberal Tweet.

So the message is that groping is acceptable? Besides being patently ridiculous, this publication would like to see these posters give that advice and counsel to the women in their lives. "Dear, if that colleague at work merely gropes you and forces a kiss, just take it, especially if he is valuable to the company."

The strategy of feigned outrage and de minimis accountability is best exemplified by Governor Dayton, who was forced to tap dance around the resignation issue yesterday when he was asked why he called for state Sen. Schoen and Rep. Cornish to resign but not Sen. Franken.

Dayton solemnly announced that the difference is that the U.S. Senate has an ethics committee to investigate while the state legislature doesn't.

What a crock. The Senate Ethics Committee has the mission of investigating misconduct while in the Senate. The Tweeden incident happened well before that time.

Moreover, does anyone really believe the committee will do the right thing? Please.

In sum, none of this should surprise us.

Bill Clinton exposed this entire cynical charade over 20 years ago.

When it comes to the collective political pursuits of the Left, individual rights must yield, no matter how hypocritical it shows the Left to be.

Bill Clinton's accusers were hammered as "bimbos", "liars" and "uneducated white trash."

Slick Willie's flagrant abuse of these women paled in comparison to Clinton's power to appoint judges, protect late term abortion, and otherwise pander to the feminist crowd.

Recall the infamous words of Nina Burleigh, who declared, "I think American women should be lining up with their presidential kneepads on to show their gratitude for keeping the theocracy off our backs."

Watch the same thing happen with Al Franken. In the eyes of the Left, what's a little butt grabbing, groping and humiliation compared to Al's Senate vote?

PILGRIMS

No matter the state of affairs in our country, we must always pause and give thanks for many blessings we enjoy. Always.

To our loyal readers, Happy Thanksgiving!

Enjoy excerpts from this essay by Dr. Ralph F. Wilson regarding the Pilgrims and how they got their name:

It wasn't until 1840 that the term "Pilgrim" came to refer to the early Mayflower settlers.

The Pilgrims (though they weren't called that at the time) originated with the members of a Separatist congregation from Scrooby, Nottinghamshire, England, whose pastors were Richard Clifton and John Robinson. This congregation suffered difficult persecution in England because they dissented from the state Church of England.

The congregation moved to Holland in 1607 where religious freedom was greater. Some who were in prison, didn't get there for another year.

They were losing their young people and struggling at the bottom of the economic scale. If they returned to England they faced severe persecution and imprisonment. So in 1620 many from the congregation decided to emigrate to America, to the New World.

Though the Plymouth Colony was the first Separatist colony in New England, the Puritan Massachusetts Bay Colony was established by royal charter in 1629. But apparently the Massachusetts Puritans had something in common with the Plymouth Separatists even before they sailed for America - the autonomy of the local congregation and a restriction of membership to "those predestined to be God's elect." As time went on the churches in Plymouth and the Massachusetts Bay Colony came to resemble each other.

But the Plymouth colonists still weren't called Pilgrims, not for many years, not until 1840. At that point someone resurrected William Bradford's original phrase describing the Saints that had left Leiden to travel aboard the Mayflower to the New World. They left Leiden, he said, "that goodly & pleasante citie which had been their resting place for near 12 years; but they knew they were pilgrimes, & looked not much on those things, but lift up their eyes to ye heavens, their dearest cuntrie, and quieted their spirits."

Increased Support for Students and Families - Project Update - C.L.U.E. and Student and Family Advocate Programming - Ms. Tessman, Student and Family Advocate Lead. Student and Family Advocates bridge the gap between families and schools, promoting collaboration and engagement for students, linking families to community resources, providing support to families and students, and providing educational opportunities on topics such as mental health, child development, discipline and safety, and parent/student/teacher communication. A new initiative took place over the summer in a district neighborhood: CLUE - Connect people to each other; Learn about self, family, school, and community resources; Unite as lifelong learners;

Engage in creating positive culture. For 10 weeks CLUE provided a weekly opportunity for parents and students to work with community organizations, eat dinner together, and engage in learning and organized activities. Participation ranged from 80 to 160 participants each week. Ongoing feedback from parents, students, and staff summarized the success of the program - increased feeling of community, increased feeling of connection with the school district, making of new friends, and increased number of adults the participants trusted. Board comments followed, thanking Ms. Tessman for her great work and organization of this opportunity. Systemic Innovation by Design - Project Update - Dr. Rahn, Director of Innovation

Spring Lake Park MINUTES OF THE OCTOBER 30, 2017 SCHOOL BOARD WORK SESSION,

This is an abridged version of the October 30, 2017 School Board Work Session minutes. The complete version can be found on the District website at springlakeparkschools.org and at the District Services Center in the Superintendent's Office.

A. Call to Order
Chairperson Stroebel called the meeting to order at 6:00pm. The following School Board members were present: Stroebel, Hennen, Amundson, Delfs, Easter, Forsberg, along with Superintendent Ronneberg.

School Board member absent: Ruch - out of town.

B. Agenda Approval - the agenda was approved as presented.

C. Discussion Items

1. Facilities Project - Input and Next Steps - Dr. Ronneberg asked for input from the board regarding projects being designed that aren't part of the 2016 bond referendum. Bond and non-bond projects will be outlined at the Nov. 14th regular meeting and board approval will be requested to move forward with those not part of the bond. Board member discussion supported the direction of the projects.

2. Fall 2018 Planning - Process and Key Achievement Points - Dr. Ronneberg shared a summary of planning work being done to look at the start of the 2018-19 school year. With a new school opening and new/updated spaces across the district, the board members were asked for their input on what they envision students, families, and staff across the district experiencing at the start of the next school year. Board member input will be incorporated in to the design. Dr.

Ronneberg highlighted the major focus areas including: boundaries, staffing, enrollment, K-4 Educational Services (curriculum materials, staffing for EL programming), Early Learning (each of the K-4 schools will have pre-school), transitions and logistics for families, students and staff, communication plan, and Westwood Gr. 5-8 programming. Key milestones were shared. Board comments followed.

3. Professional Learning Update - Dr. Ronneberg gave an update on the Inviting Student Learning Environment project of the District Operational Plan (DOP) which incorporates positioning kids for the future, personalized learning, behavior expectations, and aligning a common set of expectations across all the schools. Staff professional learning took place district-wide during the week of October 16.

4. Polling Locations 2018 - Due to recent legislative changes, school boards are now required to annually approve, by end of the calendar year, combined polling locations for school district elections for the upcoming year, whether the district has a scheduled election or not. In addition, locations must be sites currently used by the city/municipality for its own general elections. The board discussed the polling locations available in Blaine and directed administration to move forward with creating the resolution to approve combined polling locations for 2018. Action will be taken at the November or December board regular meeting.

5. Other - Dr. Ronneberg requested that a work session be scheduled prior to the Nov. 14th school board regular meeting to further discuss the facilities projects that the board will be asked to approve that evening.

The work session will be scheduled to take place just prior to the Nov. 14th meeting, from 5:45pm - 6:45pm at the District Services Center. D. Adjournment
